AVOID WALL STREET, SAYS FAIR SINGER
WHO WON FORTUNE THERE IN FIVE DAYS

Mme. Frances Alda.

NEW YORK, Oct. 8.—Miss Portia Willis went over into the East Side the other day to plead for the vote—some three centuries after Portia's first pleadings with Shylock in the "Merchant of Venice." The question of race feuds was no longer to be considered. Nobody was whetting a knife on a shoe sole.

Just as the modern Portia got into the eloquence of her speech, however, something in a look from the crowd—an intangible nothing—stopped her. She turned to a policeman: "What is it? Did I say anything wrong?"

Nothing wrong was said. It was merely that the modern Portia had forgot the difference in words. Her words were English and the audience understood only Yiddish but that did not check her. Most women would have retired blushing, but she grabbed up a chair and started walking.

The poetry of motion doesn't need a translator. Soon the entire street was a mass of shuffling feet. Miss Willis had made her meeting a huge success.

New York is supposed to be a city where the carrying of a pistol is a crime. The law works some queer twists. At the "The" McManus ball the other day in Harlem, two policemen were fatally wounded and carried out.

The amazing circumstance in the fight was that while the thugs had plenty of revolvers the police on the other hand had not even their black-jacks. Police rules require policemen to carry revolvers and blackjacks at all times.

The law against carrying concealed weapons seems to be mainly enforced against timid women who keep a little pearl-handled revolver in the drawer as a protection against burglars. Gangsters and professional murderers carry all the guns they need for their trade.

Louis H. Chalif was dining at his club the other evening when the waiter who usually serves him said: "Begging your pardon, Mr. Chalif, but I'll be leaving you shortly, sir."

Chalif inquired the reason and the waiter said he had a chance to make more money in a club further uptown. "It would be a benefit, sir, a great benefit, indeed, sir, if you would care to write me a letter of recommendation."

Chalif hesitated. "Well, you see," he finally said, "I know you are a good waiter, but I have no reasons to know that you are honest."

Finally Chalif consented and retiring to the writing room, made out a brief certificate. When he handed it to the waiter he said: "Thank you, Mr. Chalif. All next week I will make your checks out short."

Wiretapping, the old Broadway game, will not soon die. The bunco men could not pull off the ancient gag in any place in the world, but on Broadway. It is so flimsy that it would seem the most impossible trick would immediately see through it.

The famous Gondorfe, kings of the wiretappers, made a fortune out of the game for years before they were finally cornered. They rarely went off Broadway for victims—the picking was too easy there.

The latest victim was Claude Claborn, who wears a thick mustache, spats and "Haw Hays" fearfully, you know. Fearfully. He said he was an agent of the English government sent to purchase some goods. The wiretappers got $2,000 of his money with-
